The fate of Troy Anthony Davis moved to the Georgia Supreme Court on Monday after state parole officials voted to suspend his clemency request.

The five members of the Board of Pardons and Paroles said Monday they would “suspend consideration” of a request by attorneys for Davis while the state high court considers the death row inmate’s appeal.

“Because the board is no longer considering Davis’ case, it no longer has authority to grant a stay, which is therefore suspended,” the board noted in a statement issued shortly after midday Monday.
